INTRODUCTION

History

After the Communist party of Egypt dissolved itself in 1965 and was united with the Arab Socialist Union (ASU), many of its members were demoralized. They remained unconvinced of the wisdom of the decision to become completely associated with Nasserism and tried to maintain an independent stance. The disastrous results of the Arab-Israeli war in 1967 provided them with the opportunity to create a nucleus of a new communist movement. Regarding themselves not yet capable of reestablishing a full-blown communist party, the group called itself Jama'at bi-la Ism, 'The Group Without a Name'. It published several leaflets under the name of Ahmed 'Urabi al-Misri, the famous national hero who had led the revolt against the British in 1882, and during the October war in 1973 the group started to publish al-Intisar (Victory). Gradually al-Intisar became a regularly published periodical.

When the capitalist and pro-Western policy of Sadat became more obvious, the group decided to reestablish itself as a Communist Party. In January 1974 it formed a founding Central Committee, which issued a lengthy document enumerating the minimum conditions for establishing a Communist party; in August it published a draft programme for action for the Egyptian popular forces, and on 1 May 1975 the group finally declared itself the renewed Communist Party of Egypt (CPE).

The high theoretical level of the CPE is evident in the numerous analyses it produced of Egypt's political and economic situation. In July 1975 the CPE issued its first programme report in which it described Egypt as having joined a common alliance with capitalist and imperialist forces of the United States, Israel and the rich oil states of the Gulf. The pamphlets and leaflets the CPE issued during the 1970s and early 1980s point out the inter-relationship between Egypt's integration into the capitalist world, the peace with Israel and its increasing isolation in the Arab world. Egypt's growing dependency on the United States was also related to the weakening of the Palestinian resistance and the outbreak of the Lebanese civil war.

In June and July 1978 the politbureau of the party met to formulate a new programme of action to respond to the deteriorating economic and political developments.

In its programme the CPE called for the immediate overthrow of the 'parasitic capitalist regime' of Sadat, the rejection of the capitulation policy with Israel, the mobilization of the masses to liberate all occupied Arab land, and the return of Egypt to the progressive Arab camp. In September 1980 the CPE held its first party congress. The congress produced five documents: the party programme, its bylaws, an organizational report, and two working papers - 'The National Democratic Front in Egypt' and 'Consolidation of the Egyptian Communist Movement.' In 1984 the CPE held its second congress and in 1987 it nominated four of its well-known leaders as candidates to participate in the general elections. Because the party was banned from running the elections, its candidates were supported by the Tagammu^c Party as individuals on nonparty lists through the publication of their campaign propaganda in its newspaper. The CPE's basic platform consisted of the repeal of the Camp David accords and the call for the end of Egypt's political, economic and military dependence on the United States. In addition, all international agreements conducted by the Egyptian government since May 1971 should be reevaluated.

The collection

The collection of the Communist Party of Egypt was acquired with the assistance of Dr. Rif^cat al-Sa^cid. In 1995 it was brought to Amsterdam from Minsk in White Russia where the collection was kept in the custody of an Egyptian émigré during the 1980s. The collection is probably a 'shadow' or 'reserve' archive of the CPE consisting mostly of duplicates of documents. It is not an original archives in the strict meaning of the word: it doesn't contain, for instance, correspondence by the Central Committee. Some sections of the collection do, however, appear to be parts of the original archives, such as the extensive and unique documentation of the meeting of the Central Committee in November 1984, which contains minutes of the meeting, adopted resolutions and the four discussed working papers (see nos. 2-14). Although the collection is not complete, it does give a unique insight into the thought and strategy of the CPE on account of the diversity of the documents, ranging from congress papers, resolutions and lengthy analyses used for determining the strategy of the party, to specialised activities of the CPE such as its student movement. In addition, the collection contains leaflets and pamphlets issued by the CPE on internal Egyptian and foreign Egyptian affairs; several party periodicals such as al-Intisar, al-Nashra al-Tanzimiyya and al-Wa^cy; and furthermore newspaper clippings and other documentation collected by members of the CPE.

At the end of 1997 the arrangement of the collection, which wasn't properly arranged, has been started. Documents relating to the same subjects have been grouped together and series have been made of resolutions by the Central Committee, of communiques and of copies of party periodicals. In January 1998 the work has been completed. The size of the collection is 1 m.
